Not illustrated. 1908 Excerpt: ...of headache, and the temperature chart registers an elevation to 99 or 100 F. These are precisely the symptoms which are found during the negative phase after an excessive dose of bacterial vaccine. Owing to the extreme care and judgment exercised by Dr. Paterson in the selection of suitable work for the patients, and to the rigid supervision carried out, not only during work hours but throughout the day, these overdoses are very infrequent at Frimley. During my stay of one month at the sanatorium only two transient instances of such overdosage occurred, and in both cases the opportunities were taken to examine the bloods (Charts 9 and 10). In both cases the febrile rise and other symptoms coincided with a negative phase; and while in both cases a positive phase appeared afterward, in the first the recovery was simultaneous with the decline of the fever. It should be noted that this patient was kept in bed, while the other was allowed to do modified work during his pyrexia, (c) If a focus of infection becomes arrested, autoinoculations from this focus cease. In Wright's words: "Where an artificial inoculation can no longer be induced in a focus which previously could be influenced, we are entitled to conclude that the focus of infection is extinct." Therefore, some of the early cases of pulmonary tuberculosis, many of whom had lost expectoration and tubercle bacilli, who were doing the hardest possible work without rise of temperature or discomfort, might be expected to afford evidence in their blood that their focus of infection was no longer aglow, but arrested. The following results were obtained from patients constructing a water reservoir (full navy work). Case 1 (Chart 11, A).--The patient was a male, aged twenty-four years, a brass finishe...
