It is often taken for granted that there is a sort of common doctrine or theory of life known as Christianity, to which those who are English Churchmen add certain views peculiarly their own, while Roman Catholics require something more than either English Churchmen or Protestant dissenters are prepared to accept. It is, to my mind, a perfectly logical extension of this view to assume that there is a still more general body of doctrine, included under the name of Theism, to which those, who in any definite sense are called Christians, add the belief in the Divinity of Christ, and, either as a presupposition or as a corollary, a more or less complete acceptance of the doctrine of the Trinity. And there is no reason why this generalizing process should not be indefinitely extended. Certainly I should be the last to deny the debt which our generation owes to Prof. TH. Green and Dr. Martineau.
